The private enforcement regime is the primary mechanism adopted by many common law jurisdictions for securing compliance with directors ' duties. The crucial question is whether this regime is effective in securing enforcement of directors ' duties.

The power to control litigation in the company's name is normally vested in the board of directors. This gives rise to a conflict of interest whenever some or all of the directors breach their duties. In such a situation, the board's decision whether or not to litigate is potentially tainted because the wrongdoers are part of the decision-making process. The board as a whole is therefore an unsuitable decision-making body and the following question arises: who should decide whether it is in the company's interest to initiate litigation against the alleged wrongdoers? There are a number of different persons and bodies in which the decision-making power could be vested. The British approach is the reversion of management power to the shareholders in general meeting and, in certain restricted situations, the availability of the derivative action brought by a shareholder on behalf of the company. Both mechanisms give rise to significant difficulties. This book begins by explaining the board's conflict of interest, sets out a theoretical framework of legal strategies that cover the whole range of approaches to deal with it and analyses their strengths and weaknesses. The analysis consists of an assessment and comparison of four models of the enforcement of directors' duties, which are based on the current law and reform proposals in Britain and Germany. Particular reference is made to recent case law and its practical implications.

This discerning book examines good governance developments concerning anti-bribery efforts in the US and the UK, recognising that with each new major case of corporate malfeasance the parameters of directors' duties change and expand. Taking this expansion of roles and expectations into account, and acknowledging the respective increase in exposure to civil, criminal and reputational liabilities, Patrick J. O'Malley compares the fundamental national compliance experiences of the US and UK. Investigating anti-bribery, corporate and securities law and guidance, this engaging book explores systemic expectations of directors, executive officers and compliance personnel in public and private companies.

Reviews the effectiveness with which the Australian Securities and Investment Commission enforces directors' duties. This raises the issue of whether ASIC has been successful in restoring confidence in the investing public through the punishment of directors who have contravened the relevant provisions within the Corporations Act 2001, but also whether ASIC has been transparent enough to allow businesses to operate in a way where they are relatively free from excessive regulatory costs and constraints. Reviews the enforcement activity with which ASIC has been involved to determine the effectiveness of ASIC in the enforcement of directors' duties in light of whether the objectives of ASIC have been adequately met.
