Because real GDP is adjusted for the changes in inflation (in other words, it has no price effect in it), it can also be referred to as output. The relationship between exchange rates and output, usually the percent change in output (in short, growth rates), is used. Some of the exchange rate determination theories, such as the monetary approach to exchange rates, predict that higher growth rates in a country lead to an appreciation of this country's currency.

The Exchange Rate and Unemployment. An exchange rate appreciation causes a slower growth of real GDP because of a fall in net exports (reduced injection) and a rise in the demand for imports (an increased leakage in the circular flow). A reduction in demand and output may cause job losses as businesses seek to control costs.
