Tattooing is an old tradition that is deeply embedded in some cultures, while in other cultures it is considered taboo. Here, we highlight a few of those cultures. The New Zealand Māori are perhaps among some of the most well-known cultures to embrace tattoos. Known as ta moko, the tattoos are traditionally done on a person's face. Each tattoo "contains ancestral tribal messages specific to the wearer."

Such a study of tattoos can tell us much about the semiotic nature of culture, taboo and associated understandings of risk, the risk of permanence. For a long time tattoos were 'made' taboo (also read Mary Douglas). The making of taboos and the study of rituals and gesture should be of much interest to people in the risk industry that thrives on the making of salvation rituals against taboos.
