Photography as art, as opposed to fashion or reportage etc. has probably not been much in the public eye since the 1920's and 30's, changing over the war years and being a vehicle for recording images, including contemporary art works, but not works of art in themselves.

Contemporary photographers often use these developments to present new perspectives on traditional subjects and compositions. The New Topographics documented expansive, deadpan views of nature, while, more recently, Alec Soth and Taryn Simon have captured portraits of subjects from the fringes of society.

Contemporary photography could be described as a photograph from our own time, compared to an image from a much earlier period. A relevant definition of the word contemporary is: "happening in the same period of time..of or in the style of the present or recent times... ." 1

Contemporary Photography is actually somewhere in the space in time between today, and the earliest inception of the medium. There are no bookends to defining a period for "Contemporary Photography".

Relevance

In its most basic sense, the term contemporary art refers to art—namely, painting, sculpture, photography, installation, performance, and video art—produced today. Though seemingly simple, the details surrounding this definition are often a bit fuzzy, as different individuals' interpretations of “today” may widely and wildly vary.

Photorealism—also referred to as superrealism—is a genre established by American author and art dealer Louis K. Meisel in 1969. Rather than observing events in real-time, the style was inspired by photography, using the visual information captured by a camera to create illusionistic paintings, drawings, and other works of art. Artists would often project photographs onto canvas to allow the . . .
